STANLEY LAKE. Showing the Mirage

RED FISH LAKE, CUSTER COUNTY IDAHO.

Scenic Wonders and Rich Unset- tled Fields of Central Idaho as Described by Clarence E. Ed- dy, "The Poet- Prospector."

During the old historic placer fields of the Boise basin and the Selkirk valley of the Snake River, we traversed the Bear valley and Stanley Basin through tens of thousands of years, but rich, beautiful meadow lands, watered by crystal mountain streams, and above these lakes, the densest of evergreen forests are densely clothed with evergreen trees, and the lower into bald, tremendous peaks, attaining altitudes of 10,000 feet above the level of the an almost unknown mountain range in several resources that will yet afford homes and fields for thousands. It is a singular fact that these rich lands lie unoccupied, one of the few of the open frontier now to be seen in America. The elevation, some 6,000 feet and there from November until May, but the timber of other grasses, the pines, and added to the evergreen ranges, would make a fine range for an industry insuring the waters by the meadows, trout and salmon sport undisturbed, or nearly so, except when some occasional passer, ignoring the enactments of the Idaho legislature, "takes more than twenty pounds with the line and pole," or paralyzes them with dynamite.

In the lower end of Bear valley is a tract of clear, rich land, about five miles square, level as a floor and walled by forests. A great mountain rises gently to the southward, displaying miles of an almost uniform growth of dark green pines, so countless in number they are strikingly impressive of the infinite. The tremendous, towering, mist-wreathed summits of the Sawtooth mountains, look over from the south-east, like animate sentinels of the supernatural.

Recalls Cataclysm.

Ascending a few miles further to the summit of the divide between Bear valley and Stanley basin, one looks southward into the very teeth of this sublimely terrible mass of titanic crags and peaks—the Sawtooth—solemn memorial of one of earth's most awful cataclysms. Calm now and robed beneath with mighty forests, they are solemnly beautiful—the Alps of Idaho, the Switzerland of the new world. Gold of the dusk and dawn make glorious their summits. When the light of day has vanished from the valley and the robin chirps from tree tops his last good night, a heavy crimson still hoods the higher crags, fading softly to the silver of the moon or stars.

Then the great owls flit from their daylight haunts and go hooting down the wooded dells, the coyote sounds his ghoulish cry from some hillside cove, and save for these and the voice of winds or cataracts the night and silence reign supreme. All is so strangely still that you seem to hear the music of the spheres, the machinery of the universe moving upon its axes. The earth rolling eastward drops a dark horizon rim, gently down and down from beneath the moon, beaming softly on its pathway through the dome of stars.

And this is Stanley basin. United States of America, whose citizens go to foreign climes in quest of grandeur, because the older world has had its artists and poets to paint or pen scenes not so peerless as these.

At Stanley Lake.

Descending into Stanley basin by way of Cape Horn creek and past the hot springs, one traverses to the southward some fifteen miles of wild meadow, then turning westward through the woods for three miles, Stanley lake is found, filling a cove at the foot of some high-towering pinnacles. Here the bull trout and red fish make their home in the deep, blue waters, the deer come down to drink and the bear to wallow or watch for squaw-fish in the shallows. Wild goats and sheep scurry about on the crag above, but all this game is usually quite shy and safe from capture.

Stanley lake is about two miles long by one and a half in width, and in autumn is a rendezvous for great flocks of wild fowl. The lake, like many others of this volcanic chain, is of unknown depth, filling what was perhaps a crater. Its surface is often so placid as to mirror perfectly all the surrounding scene. Calm in the sunlight, its deep, clear waters embosom an inverted world—a mirage of mountain and sky that dazzles those who gaze into its depths.

Red Fish Lake.

Stanley lake is only a miniature of the big Red-Fish lake, which is, by road, fifteen miles further to the southward, in this Sawtooth range. Red-Fish lake is about three by seven miles in extent and of unmeasured depth. The fish, from which it gets its name, live, blind it is said, near the sunless bottom, except for an interval in August or September, when they swarm by myriads to the shores and inlets. Bull trout, squaw-fish and sometimes salmon, are said to be plentiful in this lake, but those caught by the writer were not sufficient to constitute an infringement of the fish laws. Wild fowl are plentiful in the fall and great flocks of them alighting both day and night often sound like an avalanche.

Sawtooth Range.

The loftiest summits of the Sawtooth rise precipitously from the western shores of Red-Fish lake, and in the calm of mornings the roar of cataracts is wafted downward from the canyons. Often at sunrise or sunset the scene is softly veiled in bright-hued mists and haze of sunbeams stream across the waters, like the strands of a fairy lye.

The summers wax and wane in solitude and the winters wait on silent ermine wings, for civilization has never come to build there its habitations.

But perhaps in days soon to be, when a railroad is built that way, Stanley basin will be heralded and recognized as one of the scenic wonders of America.

NO REASON FOR IT

When Salt Lake City Citizens Show the Way Out.

There can be no just reason why any reader of this will continue to suffer the tortures of an aching back, the annoyance of urinary disorders, the dangers of serious kidney ills when relief is so near at hand and the most positive proof given that they can be cured. Read what a Salt Lake City citizen says.

Mrs. Elizabeth Sellers, 230 Brown's Court, Salt Lake City, Utah, says: "It was about two years ago that I first took Doan's Kidney Pills. I suffered for quite awhile from a weak back and pains across my shoulders and hips. I was finally told that I had lumbarago and that Doan's Kidney Pills would cure me. I procured a supply at Schramm-Johnson's Drug Store and was helped so greatly from the first that I continued their use until every symptom of kidney complaint had left. I still take Doan's Kidney Pills occasionally and find that they keep my kidneys in a normal condition."

For sale at Schramm-Johnson's Drug Store, Salt Lake City, Utah, and by all dealers. Price 50c. Foster-McBain Co., Buffalo, New York, sole agents for the United States.

Remember the name—Doan's—and take no other.
